Cooksville

Community Profile

History

The Cooksville District has historically been centered around the Hurontario Street and Dundas Street intersection, commonly known as "The Cooksville Corners". The Cooksville Corners was originally a small village settled in the 1820s and became formally known as Cooksville in 1836 when it was named after Jacob Cook, the area's leading business entrepreneur.

In 1852, fire destroyed many of the original homes and businesses in the village and the area began to fall into decline. Much of the economic activity moved south to Port Credit as the result of the federal government's decision to build a railway along the Lake Ontario shoreline rather than along Dundas Street. The area continued to decline economically until the 1870s when Cooksville was chosen over Streetsville as the new site for the Toronto Township Hall and remained the centre of Toronto Township until the 1970s.

Between the 1950s and the 1980s numerous residential neighbourhoods, such as North Cooksville, Munden Park, West Cooksville and Gordon Woods to name a few, evolved in all directions surrounding the original village.

During the 1980s and 1990s, office, commercial and institutional uses started to leave the Cooksville area as the result of earlier decisions to develop a City Core for these types of uses near the Square One regional shopping mall and the surrounding lands south of Highway 403. Today, Cooksville has become a transitional area with future focus on both redevelopment and preservation of existing established neighbourhoods.
